

Danella Taylor (Psychologist)

Developing therapy goals

Sometimes things will work and that's really good and then other times it won't work and that's ok because it means that it's not the right goal for the child, it's not necessarily about the right therapist but about the right goal.

It's really important that parents and therapists can work together and look at ways of what is working and what is not working because we want to increase the behaviours that are working the best and decrease the ones that don't.

 This is an approximate transcription only; minor modifications have been made to assist the reader.*